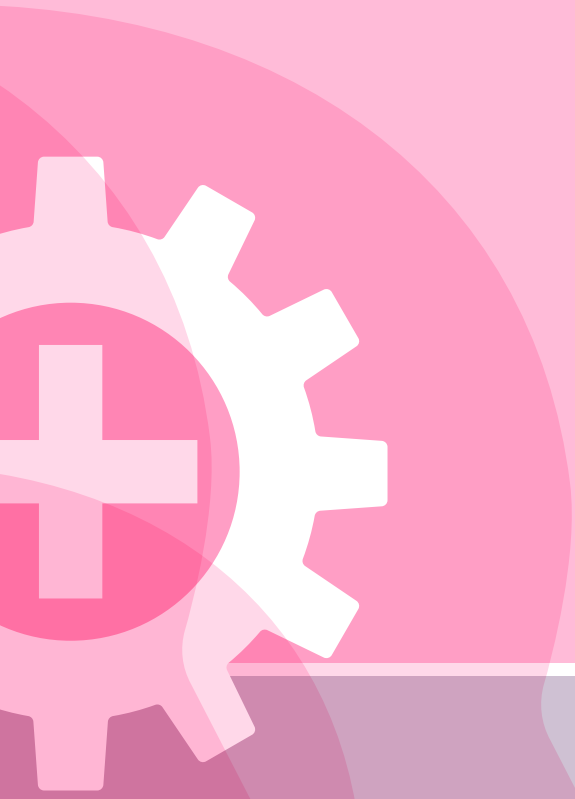
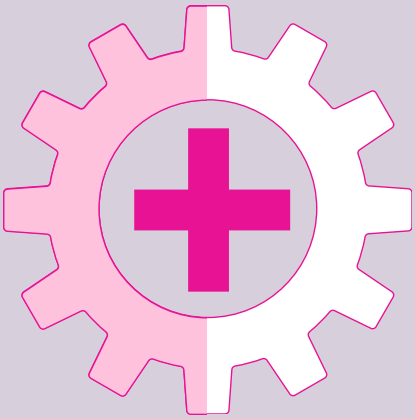
mentalhealth
MATTERS



mental health in numbers

UNISON
the public service union



52%

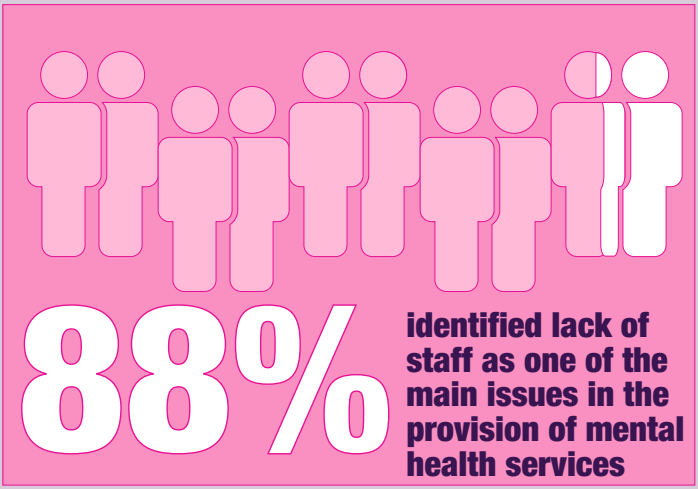
do not think there are good opportunities for career progression in mental health

UNISON is asking employers to focus on improving training and development opportunities for staff, as a well trained, motivated workforce can deliver the highest standards of care.

45%

are thinking of leaving their work in mental health

UNISON is calling on Government to provide funding that stops harmful cuts to teams, reduces workloads, and increases training opportunities that allow staff to feel well equipped to carry out their roles.



UNISON is calling on Government to provide funding that allows for well resourced teams who are able to dedicate time and resources to all those they support.

We are asking employers to work jointly with us, to agree health and wellbeing policies that prioritise the importance of good mental health for all staff.

“I can’t deliver the quality of care service users need and deserve.”

Long waiting lists because of staff shortages mean service users are unable to access the support they need as quickly as they should. We are asking government to take note, and act now to ensure the mental health of children, adolescents and adults are prioritised.

Not in UNISON?
Join today at joinunison.org or call 0800 171 2193

UNISON
the public service union

Published and printed by UNISON, UNISON Centre, 130 Euston Road, London NW1 2AY.
CU/March 2019/25504/stock no 4066/UNP15467